Natalie Runyon has 20 years of experience working and volunteering for multinational corporations, non-profits, and the US Government--Thomson Reuters, Goldman Sachs, and Central Intelligence Agency. Currently, she is the content strategist for the Thomson Reuters enterprise content platform on Talent, Inclusion & Culture Platform within the Brand Marketing function. Previously, she has led the strategy and operations team for the Legal business's most important law firm and corporate clients and before that, headed up the Americas global security team.

Natalie utilizes her leadership expertise as the creator of a career advancement program called Be the CEO of Your Career, which has been launched globally within Thomson Reuters with more than 1,300 men and women participating in the program over the last five years. She also leads inclusion workshops on increasing the allies population for underrepresented groups and how to advance lawyers of color, leveraging her experience as the cultivating the next generation of leaders as a former co-chair of the New York City chapter of Women@ThomsonReuters, of the global steering committee of the women's network, and former governance board member of the Wall Street Women's Alliance.

Natalie is a conference speaker and an author of articles for the Legal Executive Institute, The Conference Board's Women's Leadership Conference, and The Better Man Conference. She also serves on the board of She Should Run, a non-partisan nonprofit focused on building the pipeline of women to run for elected public office.

She earned her M.B.A from The George Washington University and her B.S. in International Trade and Finance from Louisiana State University. She completed an Organization Development & Leadership certificate from NYU in April 2016 and is a Certified Leadership Coach and Certified Protection Professional.
